

ARTIST

Vasantha Yoganathan

TITLE

Cloudscape

DATE

2013

DIMENSIONS

12" H x 15" W

MEDIUM

Inkjet Prints

CATALOGUE NUMBER

2020.018

CURRENT LOCATION

1620-10D

VASANTHA YOGANANTHAN

BORN

1985

BIRTHPLACE

Grenoble, France

GENDER

Male

CITIZENSHIP

France

CULTURAL HERITAGE

South Asian

LIGHT WORK RELATIONSHIP

Artist-in-Residence, November 2018

Lecturer, 2018

BIOGRAPHY

Born in 1985, Vasantha Yoganathan lives and works in Paris. His photographic practice addresses the space between documentary and fiction.

His projects are developed over long periods of time and he only works analog – with both large-format 4x5 and medium-format 6x7 cameras. Besides the aesthetic, he is deeply attached to film photography for its slow – almost philosophical – process.

Over the years, Vasantha Yoganathan has developed a distinctive colour palette solely based on natural light. His interest in painting has led him to work around the genres of portrait, landscape and still life. In his project A Myth of Two Souls (2013-2019), he has been working with a local Indian artist to revive the tradition of hand-painting. The more his practice grows, the more he perceives photography as a malleable material open to interpretations.

The book form has been central to his work since the beginning. In 2014, he co-founded the publishing house Chose Commune and published his first book, Piémanson. In his books, he interweaves staged photography with scenes from the everyday life, thus exploring different forms of photographic storytelling. His project A Myth of Two Souls will be published into 7 books (2016-2020) by Chose Commune. The first four chapters, Early Times, The Promise, Exile and Dandaka have already been published.

Vasantha Yoganathan has received several awards, among which the IdeasTap Magnum Photos Award (2015), The Prix Levallois (2016) and an ICP Infinity Award as Emerging Photographer of the Year (2017). That same year he was also selected among the 20 FOAM Talents.

circa 2018

ESSAYS

A Myth of Two Souls is a long-term photographic project by Vasantha Yoganathan. Projected to fill seven volumes, this work-in-progress, part documentary and part fiction, will span the main parts of India's epic mythological poem, the Ramayana. This popular classic hugely pervades South Asian culture and influences the everyday through traditions, religion, morality, and ideology. The story's central character, Rama, rescues his wife, Sita, from the clutches of the evil Ravana, who abducts her. In the story, this long and complex tale examines social and familial relationships, what comes of one's words and deeds, love and loss, promise and honor, life, struggle, and death. Yoganathan uses this epic to reflect upon contemporary India and its relationship with the West through his subjective lens. As a boy, Yoganathan read his father's comic book version of the story and the pictures especially fascinated him. In 2013, he visited India and this memory compelled him to read the epic itself while he was there. During this trip, he realized how visible some aspects of the epic's story were throughout Indian society. He saw evidence of the Ramayana manifested in daily life, popular culture, and in visual motifs everywhere. Yoganathan began to re-imagine and reconstruct the story as the basis for a new project in his photographic practice. The seven-book series comprising A Myth of Two Souls loosely represent the epic's seven chapters. However, retelling any classical story carries difficulty and comes with heavy responsibility. Because the Ramayana is so well known, the challenge of adaptation includes both faithfulness to the original as well as Yoganathan's ever-present need to honor his own artistic interpretation. He approaches this project as neither tourist nor strictly as an outsider. Born and brought up in France to a Sri Lankan father and a French mother, his mixed cultural heritage must have sometimes included difficulties in establishing an identity—one torn between his French national identity and one related to his father's homeland. Such a predicament comes with the displacing effects of generational diaspora: detachment, a feeling of alienation, and a strange sense of ancestral belonging. It is between these poles that Yoganathan finds himself as he travels across the Indian subcontinent. There is another predicament. Some Indians feel that Yoganathan's poetic aesthetics overlook some of the societal norms that the Ramayana imposes, especially in relationship to current controversies about gendered roles and expectations. In a society largely governed by Hindutva ideology, many interpretations of the Ramayana can be quite conservative and some would argue they promote a certain rigidity in thinking, especially where progressive contemporary thought is challenging older ideas. Yoganathan sidesteps this difficulty by creating a space in which his audiences can discuss social and political flux as opposed to those spaces in which authorities dictate norms. As Angela Davis remarked at Berlin's Akademie der Künste last June, "The aesthetic domain means we can happily set aside some of the conventions about the production of knowledge." Furthermore, Yoganathan's interpretation of the text is not one dimensional but comes with collaborative layers. He addresses the shortcomings of photography's ability to manage what John Tagg called the "burden of representation" in Tagg's 1993 book of the same title. Yoganathan uses contributions from Indian painters, illustrators, and writers to enrich and expand his own photographic sensibility. These artists bring their own subjectivity and indigenous perspectives so that an intercultural dialogue occurs within the work. In addition, the artist casts local people he meets across India to act as willing models for his tableaux, instilling a degree of street theatre and performance in the images. Working from the Ramayana, Yoganathan creates in A Myth of Two Souls a series of sites where, much like the comic books of his childhood, one can, if one desires, encounter the story entirely visually. This beautifully and poetically retells parts of this much-loved tale and further, in my opinion, provides a space where we might consider the serious issues the Indian subcontinent faces today. Besides evoking the magic of this ancient epic anew, perhaps such an artistic encounter also offers a metaphorical and visual backdrop for the hard-fought activism that is the actual battleground for this society's ills. Sunil Shah is an artist and writer based in Oxford, UK. Vasantha Yoganathan lives in Paris, France, and completed his residency at Light Work in November 2018. www.vasantha.fr